Deep stuffBy Matthew Ryan SevierReally good book. I especially like Porter's declaration that folks working in the long term care industry have an immense power -- the power to either validate a resident's psychosocial status or to strip them of every shred of dignity they have. This is powerful stuff -- should be required reading for every single person working in a nursing home.

This wonderful easy to read book has stories that are faced by caregivers around the world on a daily basis. Lori tells them in a way that allows all readers to enjoy and understand the great dedication and love that is shared between the elderly and those who care for them. Each chapter concludes with a Life's Lesson. This is the important message that each real life story demonstrates. The stories communicate this message through humor, tears, laughter and empathy.

I was born in Baxter Springs, Kansas, in the early sixties. I remember going with my mother to visit an elderly friend of hers who was living in a nursing home and wondering what was wrong with her and the other residents that would cause them to have to live in a place like this. It didn't occur to me that old age was a condition. Mrs. Brown was mother's friend, and boy, was she ancient. I sat by the bed while they visited. (There wasn't much for a kid of four years old to do in a nursing home.) It wasn't long before I discovered that old people have flabby arms. Mrs. Brown had incredible soft skin, and I wanted to touch it badly but was convinced if I was to be so bold, it would embarrass my mother, and in turn, she would slap me out of my chair. My desire got the best of me-I had to touch that flabby, soft skin. Finally, I could not resist any longer, and my right hand went for it. Once my mom discovered it, she nearly died on the spot. "Lori, stop that right now." She apologized to Mrs. Brown, but the old friend said, "Oh, honey, let her have her way. She's not bothering me; it actually feels pretty good." I thought yes, it does to me too. Well, Mrs. Brown saved me; I didn't get in trouble, and I had a way of occupying my time while on the visits. It also brought smiles to Mrs. Brown's face so how could it be bad? Who knew this was a glimpse of things to come. Life Lesson #1 The young and old have a lot to offer one another, among these are the value of a touch and a smile. I learned at a very early age that it was a pleasant experience to touch an old person and that it was a means of communication
